Jennifer,

We've redone the first page of the 1503 along the lines you suggested. You should be getting it today. And let's go with South Asian Languages and Literature as the title for the new minor.

Many thanks,
Michael

Seattle: Minor in South Asian Languages and Literature (ASIAN-20080825)

I am in favor of this proposal. The economic and cultural importance of this part of the world speaks for itself. It is vital that students in technical and social sciences who plan to work in this part of the world have a clear pathway to gaining practical language skills, while at the same time not having to commit to a full Major.

In addition I have personally interacted with faculty in the context of a South Asian language course during the 2007-2008 academic year. A very high level of student motivation and graduate student and faculty professionalism was evident. Several students obtained competitive positions in summer language programs overseas.

Timely proposal for a minor concentration in languages that are essential for global economy and historical/cultural perspective. In addition, there are significant numbers of Washington residents from these language groups, and this is an opportunity to develop a program with robust appeal to alumni and families in the region. With high tech expansion into SE Asia, this program will also serve the region. Moreover, UW has an outstanding set of scholars who work in early Buddhist manuscript translation. The offering of Sanskrit as a minor may strengthen the existing program of research and scholarship by providing undergraduate students an opportunity to focus in SE Asian languages.

Two other courses that could be added to the curriculum include:

ARCH 445 South Asian Architecture I (3) VLPA Prakash

Advanced introduction to precolonial architecture and urbanism of South Asia. Using methodologies of culture studies, examines select Hindu, Buddhist, and Islamic case studies on a comparative genealogy.

ARCH 446 South Asian Architecture II (3) VLPA Prakash

Advanced introduction to colonial and postcolonial architecture and urbanism of South Asia. Using methodologies of culture studies, covers 1800 to present, emphasizing the past 50 years since India's independence in 1947.

I am also in favor of Minor in South Asian Languages and Literature. This will provide an opportunity to the students to learn South Asian Languages without having to commit themselves for Major courses. The expertise gained through these minor course will open doors for further projects and opportunities in South Asian countries or South Asia related projects in US or elsewhere.

Jennifer,

Thank for passing the comment on. I can see no reason for not adding the architecture courses to the approved list of electives. Other than that, I don't think that there's anything else needing a response or comment.
