EXPLANATION OF AND RATIONALE FOR PROPOSED CHANGE

For new program, please include any relevant supporting documentation such as student learning outcomes, projected enrollments, letters of support and departmental handouts. (Use additional pages if necessary).

International trade, investment, travel, etc. have all increased dramatically over the past few decades, and an international perspective is increasingly necessary to understand politics, philosophy, and economics in the modern world. PPE's new International Studies track would replace the Law and Policy track, which is now a major. Unlike other general programs in international studies, where art, culture, religion, literature, and pre-modern history courses make up a large percentage of the curriculum, the International Studies track will focus on modern politics, philosophy, and economics in an international context. With International Studies replacing Law and Policy, PPE will have three well-balanced track offerings to serve its majors: Politics and Philosophy, Economics, and International Studies.

International Studies Track Proposal – January 2013

All PP&E students must take four core classes, a methods class, and a capstone class. They also need to take six additional PP&E classes. The core courses are TECON 200 (TBECON 220), TECON 201 (TBECON 221), TPOL S 201, TPOL S 202, TPOL S 203, and TPOL S 204 (students may only take two of the following three: TPOL S 202, T POL S 203, and T POL S 204).

To fulfill this track, students must take four classes from the list of International Studies track classes, with the option of using up to 5 credits from a study abroad course or one third quarter or higher language course as one of the four track classes. Students would also need to take two courses in the Economics or Politics and Philosophy tracks.

The International Studies track would replace the Law and Policy track. Unlike Global Studies, where art, culture, religion, literature, and pre-modern history courses make up a large percentage of the curriculum, the International Studies track within PPE will focus on modern politics, philosophy, and economics in an international context.
